Let's get started. Further Reading on SmashingMag: More after jump! Continue reading below 1 This last semester, I taught a "special topics" class at the university where I work, titled "Explorations in Lettering and Scripts." There were three students in the class who are left-handed. Though it varies, there is an overall increase in the percentage of people who self identify as left-handed. I asked her if that is better for her, and she said that, yes, it helps her to control her hand shakiness. However, he states that there is still some stigma about being left-handed. I mention this because sometimes we all do things by memory, not fully aware of each step we are taking. But his top advice is this: repetition. Here are two videos of her writing words from two angles: Notice that she constantly adjusts the pen and the paper to be able to create some strokes. I have fun and please share your progress with me here or on Instagram. What matters is to practice. She starts writing on the right side of the page and works her way to the left. If you are left-handed and are reading this, please know that you are in good company. That alone was a great accomplishment because, as I mentioned earlier, she used to experience a lot of hand shakiness. It is almost like doing mental gymnastics. In my two previous articles, "Brush Lettering: It Only Gets Better After Practice," part 1 and part 2, I talked about the reasons for the popularity of lettering and about supplies, inspiration, the basic principles and about forming the letters, and I also provided some videos. Bennet lists three positions for the paper: It can be held at 45 degrees to the left, making a diamond shape: (View large version) It can be held at 35 degrees:(View large version)Or it can be held normally, at 90 degrees:(View large version)The paper's position and angle and how the hand rests on the paper are critical. In this article, I hope you've found tips, practical advice, examples and inspiration. I will wait.InspirationIn my journey as a brush letterer and now practicing with the pointed pen, I have learned that, before looking at people's work, I have to think about what I want to learn from them. Beyond these, however, I hope you feel that it is attainable and that you can do it. When I started, I decided to practice every day. That is why a willingness to fail, to be comfortable with being uncomfortable, and repetitive practice will be your best friends. Practicing is OK, but selling it could (and most probably will) get you in trouble. There are a lot of letterers on Instagram who hold monthly practice challenges. Other designers and nondesigners to learn. She started back in January, and throughout the semester she has been consistently improving. Ask yourself some questions: How are they positioning the paper? How are they positioned relative to the paper? At what angle do they place the paper and the pen? Also, keep in mind that unless the person you are looking at teaches, they might have developed a way to work that they are not able to fully explain to you. Another tip is to write large letters at first, which will help with relaxing the grip, then reducing the size of the letters as one gets more comfortable. (View large version)(View large version)Let's sum up some of the advice we have gone through so far:Dr. Holder advises to grip 1 to 1.5 inches away from the tip of the brush, pen or pencil.Position the paper so that your arm rests perpendicular to the right side. Practice big letters and your arm movement first, to help you loosen your grip on the tools. Brush pens are flexible. If you're interested in pointed calligraphy, there are nib holders made for left-handers. Repetition, repetition conscious of the contrast there should be between thick and thins, so she tries to accomplish that. Another useful tip from Dr. Holder is to hold the pen or pencil, in order to see what is being written. Some will find it comfortable to rotate the paper to find the best way to create the letters. However, Dr. Holder stresses that the best position for the paper is "to the left of the child's midline, and tilted so that the top right corner." He explains that this position allows the hand to be positioned "to the left and away from the body at the start of writing line..." He adds that the angle will vary according to the person's preference. Their work is not only client-based; they have become their own brand by providing products to their followers as well. The reason for this is that it is hard to see what you've just written. Among those reasons, being left-handed in an environment where the majority are right-handed can feel daunting. He stresses that, while the grip might be tight and tense while you're learning it, with time and practice this will improve. I'd love to hear from you!Articles" Here's Why Some People Are Left Handed, According to Science," Katie Silver, Science Alert" Study Reveals Why Lefties Are Rare," Live Science "How Many People are Left Handed?," Lefty Fretz"Handedness Statistics," Luke Mastin"11 Little-Known Facts About Left-Handed," Emily Hennen BuzzFeed"Hand preference and age in the United States," A.N. But before we continue, take a moment to think about and practice some of the things you have read here. And according to BuzzFeed, Bruce Willis, Demi Moore, Pierce Brosnan, Bill Clinton, Jim Carrey, David Letterman, Bill Gates, David Bowie, Prince Charles, Prince William and even Barack Obama are all left-handed. Hand, Wrist And PaperI grouped these three aspects because they are closely related: the position of the arm and wrist go together with how the paper is positioned. Below you will see several opinions on the matter Jodi Christiansen, calligrapher and member of the International Association of Master Penmen, Engrossers, and Teachers of Handwriting (IAMPETH), writes in her post "Calligraphy and the Left-Handed Scribe" that there are two types of left-handed ways to hold the pen:Curlers curve their hand around the pen to mimic the writing angle that right-handers achieve naturally.(View large version)Non-curlers write without bending their wrist.(View large version)Based on the article, it seems that curlers might have a harder time doing lettering and calligraphy than non-curlers. One of my favorites when I started was hosted by Caroline Kelso. While you engage in these challenges, keep watching your favorite letterers and calligraphers. Notice in the video below how Talondra holds her brush pen.Matt Vergotis, logo designer and letterers, has very smart advice for left-handed letterers. Learning a new skill, no matter how much we like it, will bring moments of discomfort. That would cause a lot of smears. In addition to Christiansen's hand positions, Jim Bennett, author of the book Calligraphy for Dummies, talks about how to position the paper. He recommends practicing 15 to 20 minutes a day, and over time you will see improvement. (View large version) I will add that another element to repetition is patience and a willingness to be comfortable with being uncomfortable. In the meantime, we can all look at others' work to be inspired to be better. In this next part, I will list letterers and calligraphers who are left-handed, for your inspiration. Rest assured, there is hope and many good examples of letterers and calligraphers who are left-handed and who create gorgeous work. According to some researchers, left-handers account for 10 to 12% of the population. You will notice that she places the paper at approximately a 45-degree angle. Holding The PenThe biggest advantage of brush pens is their flexibility. The main and most important difference is that, while right-handers write away from the body, left-handers write towards the body. Use can use SMASHING5 as a code to get a freebie when you buy one. Here is a picture of one of her first practice the basic strokes that made sense to her. I have included examples using both the brush pen and the pointed nib.Ready to see some great work? Neal from LeftyFretz, a website for left-handed musicians, has put together a great post reporting the percentage of people who are left-handed, by year and country. Quick summary + Lettering and calligraphy are quickly becoming desired skills in a designer's toolbox. Take a look at this video of her doing M's:Lettering is a work in progress, where one moves from larger movement control to smaller movement control. A great number of famous people were and are left-handed, among them, Alexander the Great, Leonardo da Vinci and Vincent Van Gogh. The brush tip can turn to the left or the right. Since then, I have been trying to gather resources and examples to help them with the practical aspect of the lessons we covered. Maybe all you have is 15 minutes, or maybe you have more time. In this article, I will share theoretical as well as practical advice, demonstrating some points using my student Talondra Keeton, who is left-handed, to create lettering. He also has great tips on creating beautiful work, such as start with pencil and then ink the piece; use a grid (parallel lines); and once you get a word where you want it, trace it writing it backwards — he says in the interview that this trains your eye to tackle spacing issues. (View large version) One thing I found very interesting about Talondra's progress is that she taught herself to do some drills without lifting the pen. If your hand curls over the line of text you just wrote, it would be difficult to determine how much space to leave, let alone whether the ink is still wet. However, the majority of the resources and lessons available are for right-handed people. In other words, he tends to curl his hand over the letters. Here is a list of left-handed calligraphers and letterers. I know there must be more great ones out there, so please feel free to share in the comments!(View large version)(View large (View large version)(View is fun, but it can also be a tad frustrating for a number of reasons. Here is a video of the practice: However, when she writes a word, she starts from the left and works her way to the right side. And have patience. Or maybe you like to read books — if so, you can use excerpts to help you practice. Designers such as Marian Bantjes, Jessica Hische, Sean Wes and Martina Flor, just to name a few, have become not only an inspiration to the rest of us, but also a standard. After I wrote the articles, I realized that I offered no theoretical or practical advice to those who want to learn lettering and who are left-handed. While I am not able to guarantee your fame and notoriety, I can help you get started with the fundamentals of lettering with the left hand: the position and placement of the arm and wrist, the position of the paper, and holding the tool (brush pens). As an educator, I have learned that one of the most challenging aspects for an aspiring left-hand letterer is to apply everything that a right-handed person is teaching. He is left-handed, too, but he points out something I had not thought about, in an interview conducted by Daniel Palacios on his blog:Brush pens where the nibs split. However, the most important thing to keep in mind is "to keep the arm perpendicular to the bottom of the page," keeping the wrist straight and "the hand below the writing line." (View large version) Claire from Heart Handmade UK, who had to relearn to write after suffering an injury, advises to try to keep the elbow close to the body, to keep the arm straight, not to curl the wrist and to instead move the paper to a 45-degree angle, which will "automatically bring the hand to the correct writing position." Below is my student, Talondra, demonstrating how she places the paper. Those pens are usually suited to specific angles whereas a brush pen with that 360° range of flexibility, isn't a disadvantage to leftys. Even more interesting is that he tends to hold the brush pen above the word. Practice sheets here and let me know what you think of them. And when one finds a resource to get started with brush lettering for left-handed people, it might not be as comprehensive. Just make sure not to sell another person's excerpts or lyrics. For instance, in this case, as you look at the examples and go to their pages, keep in mind what you have read so far: arm and wrist position, paper position, and holding the pen. Some are more scientific than others, and others are more focused on practical tips. One of the most interesting things I learned while research ing for this article is that Dr. M.K. Holder, who is executive director of the Handedness Research Institute, states that writing with the left hand is not simply the opposite of writing with the left hand. it is that patience and determination to overcome the discomfort, which equals deliberate practiced, the better and better. Talondra, my student, found that the more she practiced, the better and better. Talondra, my student, found that the more she practiced the better and better.
